This report is the second instalment of the Canada West Foundation's two-year Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative, being conducted under the auspices of the larger three-year Western Cities Project. The Initiative will identify key policy areas, explore policy options and alternatives, highlight best practice models, and promote dialogue about urban Aboriginal issues. In so doing, the Canada West Foundation will increase public awareness of those issues and encourage constructive public policy debate.

To meet these objectives, the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative will include three components, each to be explored through a public policy lens.

Urban Aboriginal People in Western Canada: Realities and Policies

- Comparison of urban Aboriginal people with non-Aboriginal urban dwellers.
- Overview of current federal, provincial and municipal policies for urban Aboriginal people.

Enhanced Urban Aboriginal Programming in Western Canada

- Overview of government and non-profit sector programs for Aboriginal people in six major western Canadian cities.
- Mapping of roles of various levels of government and non-profit sector.

Best Practices and Remaining Challenges

- Identification of innovative practices, ideas and programs for urban Aboriginal people.
- Discussion of emerging issues.

The final report, including policy and research recommendations, will be released in December 2002.

INTRODUCTION

Almost as many Aboriginal people live in urban areas of Canada as do not (Figure 1), and in every city in Canada, Aboriginal people are a visible presence. This is particularly true in western Canada, where Aboriginal people comprise upwards of 8% of the population in major cities (Figure 2). Indeed, more Aboriginal people live in Winnipeg than in Nunavut and the Northwest Territories combined.

Aboriginal Identity Population (1996 Census)

SOURCE: Statistics Canada, 1996 Census.

Many urban Aboriginal people face particularly acute challenges in several facets of city life (Hanselmann 2001). Compared to the non-Aboriginal population, the Aboriginal populations of six major western Canadian cities (Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Vancouver, and Winnipeg) tend to have lower educational levels, lower labour force participation rates, higher unemployment rates, and lower income levels. Urban Aboriginal people are more likely to be in lone parent families, have poorer health status, and have higher rates of homelessness and greater housing need. In addition, Aboriginal populations are over-represented in the criminal justice system – both as victims and as offenders – and more likely to experience domestic violence.

These gaps in socio-economic conditions pose formidable challenges both for urban Aboriginal people and for governments at the federal, provincial, and municipal levels in Canada – particularly in the western cities where the Aboriginal populations are comparatively large. Exacerbating the situation until recently is the fact that “governments certainly appear to have given [urban Aboriginal people] little thought in policy and program decisions” (RCAP 1996b, 116). However, policy-makers are beginning to turn their attention to urban Aboriginal people. Hence, one goal of Canada West’s Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative is to provide information to decision-makers and the attentive public in their attempts to respond to the socio-economic gaps between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal residents of western Canada’s major cities.

At least three strategies exist for governments in responding to the socio-economic disparities:

- Do nothing: Governments would not respond in any fashion through policies or programs.
- General application policies and programs: Policies and programs to address issues for the general population would be used to address urban Aboriginal issues.
- Enhanced policies and programs: Governments would design policies and programs for urban Aboriginal people that go beyond those applicable to the general population.

In short, the range of strategies is a function of the degree to which governments choose to directly address socio-economic disparities through policies and programs.

Defining Urban Aboriginal Programs and Services

Governments may choose from among at least three strategies in responding to the socio-economic conditions of urban Aboriginal people: no response (do nothing), general application policies and programs, and enhanced policies and programs. For the purposes of this study, general application programs and enhanced programs are defined as follows.

General Application Programs

Programs and services of general application include those that provide services to urban Aboriginal people as members of the general population. Unlike enhanced programs, the mandates of general application programs do not identify any designated sub-population. It must be remembered, however, that urban Aboriginal people benefit from these programs. In fact, utilization rates are sometimes higher for urban Aboriginal people than for the general population; for example, per capita physician services among urban Aboriginal people can be double the rate for the general population (Regina Health District 2000, 57). An example of a general application program is the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan, “a program of last resort for families and individuals who, for various reasons, including disability, illness, low income or unemployment, cannot meet basic living costs.... Any person in financial need may apply for social assistance” (Saskatchewan 2001).

Enhanced Programs

Enhanced programs are those that provide designated populations with programmatic consideration at a level beyond that available to the general population. Therefore, enhanced programs for urban Aboriginal people include programs that incorporate urban Aboriginal people within larger designated populations – e.g., a program for Aboriginal people where the program criteria do not exclude or preclude urban Aboriginal people from eligibility – as well as programs for which urban Aboriginal people are the designated population. The latter subset of enhanced programs are referred to as urban Aboriginal-specific programs and include those programs where available documentation states that the program is:

- (a) Designed and/or intended to serve urban Aboriginal people as the specific designated population. For example, the Urban Circle Training Centre, jointly funded by the federal and Manitoba governments, serves “Aboriginal students living in Winnipeg” (Morrissette 2001, 7); or,
- (b) Designed for Aboriginal people, but with explicit content related to urban areas. For example, the federal government’s Aboriginal Human Resources Development Strategy includes an Urban Component that is focused on “local service delivery initiatives geared at providing access to programs and services for Aboriginal people living in urban areas or off-reserve” (Canada 2001, 1); or,

- (c) Designed for urban areas, but with explicit content related to Aboriginal people. For example, the City of Vancouver’s Community Services Grants Program provides funding “to help pay for social services that are specifically directed to or for Vancouver residents who are experiencing social, physical and/or economic disadvantages and/or who face discrimination.... [F]urther preference is given to services that respond best to the specific needs and goals identified for... [among others,] first nations people” (Vancouver 2001).

The definition of urban Aboriginal-specific programming follows the one used by Canada West to determine urban Aboriginal-specific policies (Hanselmann 2001, 11).

Evidence of enhanced programming includes – but is not limited to – a designated clientele, targeted funding (with or without modification or tailoring), delivery by an Aboriginal organization, or culturally sensitive program design or delivery.

When a government uses a combination of these program types, the programming universe for urban Aboriginal people resembles Figure 3, in which general application programs occupy a large part of the universe, enhanced programs represent a smaller portion, and urban Aboriginal-specific programs are a sub-set of enhanced programming.

Program Universe for Urban Aboriginal People

SOURCE: Derived by Canada West Foundation.

The first report of the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative, Urban Aboriginal People in Western Canada: Realities and Policies, found that governments in western Canada are, to some extent, responding to the socio-economic gaps with urban Aboriginal-specific policies (Hanselmann 2001). However, government action is not limited to creating policy; indeed, a government's approach to an issue can be seen both in public policies and in program activity. While programs often implement policy directives, they may also be (and often are) created in the absence of policy. In short, the existence of a program does not necessarily indicate that a policy exists; at the same time, policies may exist that are not "fleshed out" by program activity.

Therefore, in the light of the urban Aboriginal-specific policies that governments have in Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Vancouver, and Winnipeg, it is important to determine whether or not governments also have urban Aboriginal-specific programs. As a logical second step in the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative, this report explores the extent to which governments are using a strategy of enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people. To complement the findings with respect to government programming, the report also identifies the role of non-government organizations in delivering enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people.

Urban Aboriginal People and Programs of General Application

This report focuses on the enhanced programming landscape for urban Aboriginal people; nonetheless, it is important to note that urban Aboriginal people benefit from programs of general application. In many jurisdictions, service provision is almost exclusively through programs of general application that, by definition, are intended to address the needs of urban Aboriginal people as members of the larger society. Indeed, urban Aboriginal people often utilize programs in such fields as health care, social services, education, and justice at higher rates than the general population. Therefore, readers are cautioned that the exclusion of programs of general application from this report does not imply that such programs do not exist in the fields reviewed. Programs of general application are an integral part of any comprehensive urban Aboriginal strategy.

This report addresses two key questions:

- What enhanced programs and services are in place for urban Aboriginal people in the six large western Canadian cities of Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Vancouver, and Winnipeg?
- With respect to urban Aboriginal people, to what extent does the presence of differentiated government policy determine the presence of enhanced government programs?

Addressing these questions will help fill a significant knowledge gap in western Canadian public policy and provide an empirical basis for ongoing policy-making and policy debates.

METHODOLOGY

Enhanced Urban Aboriginal Programming in Western Canada is based on an investigation of programs and services across 20 program fields in six major western Canadian cities (Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Saskatoon, Vancouver, and Winnipeg). Seventeen of these fields replicate those reviewed in Urban Aboriginal People in Western Canada: Realities and Policies (Hanselmann 2001), while the remaining three – family, youth, and corrections – were examined in part because of their importance to urban Aboriginal people. The research does not capture all programs and services available to urban Aboriginal people; rather, it determines the extent to which enhanced programming exists.

The research phase took place between July and December 2001, and included two main components. The first element sought to identify programs and services for urban Aboriginal people provided and/or funded by federal, provincial, and municipal governments in the six cities. Publicly available information was supplemented through specific requests to each government. The information from these efforts was compiled and analysed, and the findings submitted to each government for verification.

The second component of the research attempted to determine programs and services for urban Aboriginal people offered by Aboriginal governments, and by Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal non-governmental organizations. First Nations and Métis government offices, Aboriginal Friendship Centres, and leading non-profit agencies in each city were contacted for information on programs and services for urban Aboriginal people. These efforts were supplemented by information provided through published program and service directories, non-Aboriginal governments, and Internet research.

For the purpose of categorizing programs as either general application or enhanced (and, within the category of enhanced, to identify programs that are urban Aboriginal-specific), the analytical component of the study involved reviewing available information on mandates, design, intentions, parameters, delivery, intended clients, and funding for each program and service located or referenced during the research phase.

The research parameters precluded consideration of some programs and services available to urban Aboriginal people. First, programs of general application, once identified, were not further investigated because such research would catalogue almost everything undertaken by the federal, provincial, and municipal governments – a task well beyond the scope of this study. As noted, this study seeks to determine the extent to which governments are using a strategy of enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people.

Second, the public sector defined for Canada West's Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative is limited to federal, provincial, and municipal governments. Other public institutions (e.g., health regions, school boards, Crown corporations, universities, colleges, and other post-secondary educational institutions) are outside the scope of this review. As a result, the programming activities of these institutions are not included unless there is direct involvement by a federal, provincial, or municipal government, in which case the program is identified with the specific government.

Third, the research focused on programs that were operational during the research period of July through December 2001. Programs that had been proposed but not yet implemented during this time frame are not included. Readers are further cautioned that, as programming for urban Aboriginal people is constantly changing, some programs identified in the research may have been altered or discontinued by the time of publication.

ENHANCED URBAN ABORIGINAL PROGRAMS AND SERVICES IN SIX MAJOR WESTERN CANADIAN CITIES

The federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments, Aboriginal governments, and non-government organizations – as well as the private sector and other public sector entities – fund and/or deliver programs and services for urban Aboriginal people. Figure 4 reflects the enhanced federal, provincial, and municipal government programming landscape for urban Aboriginal people in 20 fields, with fields in which the sub-category of urban Aboriginal-specific programs exist also being identified. (For a listing of the programs, see Appendix 1.)

The Challenge of Mapping Urban Aboriginal Programming

The results of this research are important to decision-makers and anyone interested in program design, delivery, and evaluation for the simple but often overlooked fact that without mapping the current program landscape, it is impossible to identify gaps, duplications, and points of congruence. A better understanding of the program landscape will allow for more informed decision-making and public debate. However, the research confronted formidable challenges, one of the most difficult being the fact that many governments do not catalogue or inventory the numerous programs and services provided to specific population sub-groups, such as urban Aboriginal people.

This constitutes a dilemma with respect to programming for urban Aboriginal people. On the one hand, many commentators (such as RCAP) argue that urban Aboriginal people are falling through the cracks as insufficient attention is directed towards their needs. On the other hand, a massive maze of programs exists, some of which no doubt apply to urban Aboriginal people – and some of which may, in fact, directly address the challenges faced by this population. A challenge for all involved in program design, delivery, and evaluation, therefore, is truly coming to grips with the urban Aboriginal programming landscape. This report is directed at mapping that uncertain landscape.

* HOUSING: No new funding or projects since 1996; honouring outstanding commitments only.

Readers should note that no distinction is made between funding and delivery in Figure 4; therefore, governments are identified as having a program regardless of whether they deliver the program themselves or if they fund delivery by another organization. Readers are also reminded that a blank cell in Figure 4 need not imply the non-existence of programming activity in the field; rather, a blank cell indicates that no enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people was located by the research. Indeed, governments offer programs of general application in most of the fields in Figure 4.

1. Federal Government

Historically, the federal government has been hesitant to provide programs and services for Aboriginal people living off-reserve. However, as more and more Aboriginal people migrated to – or were born within – cities, the federal government responded (albeit tentatively) with some urban Aboriginal programming. Over time, the level of federal program activity has increased to the point where the federal government's guide to programs for urban Aboriginal people runs over 100 pages (Canada 1997).

The federal government has a number of enhanced programs and services for urban Aboriginal people in western Canada (see Appendix 1), with the research locating examples in 16 of the 20 fields in Figure 4. In 12 of these fields – training, employment, childcare, health, homelessness, housing, justice, urban transition, cultural support, other, youth, and corrections – programs were identified that are specific to urban Aboriginal people. (However, it should be noted that federal programming in housing was discontinued in 1996 and only pre-1996 commitments continue to receive funding.) No examples of enhanced federal government programming for urban Aboriginal people were found in the fields of income support, suicide, human rights, or family.

2. Provincial Governments

The western provinces have traditionally provided programming and services for off-reserve Aboriginal people through programs and services for the general population. However, recent initiatives in several provinces have designed programs to specifically address the challenges confronting urban Aboriginal people.

Provincial governments have implemented a range of enhanced programs for urban Aboriginal people in their major cities (see Appendix 1). Figure 4 shows that all four provincial governments have urban Aboriginal programs in the areas of education and justice; in ten other fields, three of four governments offer programs. None of the four provincial governments provide enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people in income support or suicide. The extent of the British Columbia government's program activity may be greater than Figure 4 indicates as a key resource on urban Aboriginal programs in Vancouver (Vancouver Aboriginal Council 2001) was not available in time to inform this project's research.

Among the four provinces, the Manitoba government provides urban Aboriginal programming in the largest number of fields (15 of 20), with the Alberta and Saskatchewan governments each providing programs in over half the fields examined (13 and 12 fields, respectively), and the British Columbia government providing urban Aboriginal programs in eight fields. Again, it must be stressed that this inventory captures only programs that provide enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people and does not reflect provincial general population programs such as social services (also referred to as welfare or income support).

3. Municipal Governments

Historically, municipalities in western Canada have provided programs and services to urban Aboriginal people in the normal course of serving their residents. More recently, some municipalities have also started to establish and deliver programs for urban Aboriginal people (see Appendix 1). On a city-to-city basis, Figure 4 shows mixed results.

- Vancouver has enhanced programming in five fields: education, justice, urban transition, other, and youth. All five have examples of urban Aboriginal-specific programs.
- Calgary has enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people in employment, justice, and other, with all three having programs that are specifically for urban Aboriginal people.
- Edmonton has enhanced programming in eight fields – health, homelessness, justice, urban transition, cultural support, other, family, and youth – all of which include urban Aboriginal-specific programs.

- Saskatoon has enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people in nine fields, seven of which – childcare, justice, urban transition, cultural support, other, family, and youth – include programs specifically for urban Aboriginal people.
- Regina has enhanced programming activity in seven fields – education, training, childcare, addictions, other, family, and youth – with all of the examples being specific to urban Aboriginal people.
- Winnipeg has enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people in four fields: training, employment, other, and youth. All four have examples of urban Aboriginal-specific programs.

Overall, the municipal landscape for urban Aboriginal programs is considerably less occupied than either the federal or provincial landscapes. The City of Saskatoon has enhanced programming in the most fields while Calgary has the least. Every City has programming that falls into the catchall field of other, five of six have programs for youth, and four have programming in justice. At the same time, the research did not find any enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people in income support, family violence, suicide, housing, or human rights. Only Saskatoon had enhanced programming in economic development, Regina was alone in programming in addictions, and enhanced programming for homelessness was found only in Edmonton. Although not always readily apparent, many of the programs and services provided and/or funded by municipal governments receive financial support from provincial governments.

4. Aboriginal and Non-profit Organizations

Many commentators, most notably the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, suggest that urban Aboriginal people are underserved by federal, provincial, and municipal governments, and that it therefore falls to Aboriginal and non-governmental organizations to provide programs and services for this population sub-group (RCAP 1996a, 554). Figure 5 identifies the fields in which the research located enhanced programs for urban Aboriginal people provided by Aboriginal or non-profit organizations; programming specifically for urban Aboriginal people is also identified (see Appendix 1 for a listing of programs). Readers should note that in many instances Aboriginal or non-profit organizations receive funding for program delivery from one or more of the federal, provincial, and municipal governments.

As Figure 5 demonstrates, every field in which enhanced urban Aboriginal programming was located includes at least one example of a program that is specifically for urban Aboriginal people. Most of the 20 fields show some programming, the exceptions being income support, suicide, and human rights.

ENHANCED URBAN ABORIGINAL PROGRAM LANDSCAPE

Four conclusions can be drawn from combining the government, Aboriginal, and non-profit landscapes (Figure 6). First, most fields have some level of program activity directed towards urban Aboriginal people. In all six cities, enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people exists in 16 of the 20 fields researched. Canada West's research also identified programming in an additional field – family – in five of the six cities. These findings suggest that, in terms of the mere presence of enhanced programming – and in no way commenting on the quality or adequacy of the programming – urban Aboriginal programming is quite comprehensive in the six cities.

Second, Figure 6 shows very few absolute gaps – i.e., the complete absence of enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people – in the landscape of the six cities. Only two fields – income support and suicide – did not include enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people. A third field – human rights – revealed enhanced programming only on the part of the Government of Alberta; thus, only in Calgary and Edmonton.

Without diminishing the importance of these fields to urban Aboriginal people (indeed, these fields are particularly relevant to all Aboriginal people in Canada), it is noteworthy that so few fields are completely without enhanced programming.

Third, the programming landscape shows no instance in which Aboriginal or non-profit organizations are alone in providing programming. In each city, every field in which Aboriginal or non-profit organizations deliver programs also shows programming activity by the public sector (federal, provincial, or municipal government). This is due to the fact that governments are funding most of the programming activity delivered by Aboriginal or non-profit organizations.

Fourth, the programming landscape outlined in Figure 6 allows a preliminary assessment of the capacity of western cities to serve urban Aboriginal people. As has been observed, enhanced programming exists for urban Aboriginal people in most of the fields researched. The research found no cases of Aboriginal or non-profit programming in the absence of some level of government, eight examples where one level of government was alone in providing programming in a field, and 20 cases in which Aboriginal or non-profit organizations deliver programming complemented by just one level of government. In the majority of situations (75 of 120), however, at least two levels of government have programming activity in a field, sometimes combined with the efforts of Aboriginal or non-profit organizations. Thus, although data do not yet exist to allow for an evaluation of the extent to which existing programs address the challenges confronting urban Aboriginal people, program infrastructure clearly exists in most of the fields reviewed. The same cannot be said with respect to the fields of income support, suicide, and human rights.

COMPARING POLICIES WITH PROGRAMS

The first report of the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative identified the public (government) policies in place with respect to urban Aboriginal people in the six cities (Hanselmann 2001). In that report, a distinction was drawn between “government-wide” and “department-specific” policies. Government-wide policies are overarching statements of a government’s approach to urban Aboriginal people while department-specific policies describe a departmental strategy.

To what extent does the presence of urban Aboriginal-specific policy determine the presence of enhanced programs for urban Aboriginal people? Figure 7 superimposes the findings of the current research on the findings of the first report to identify fields in which policies exist without programs, programs exist without policies, and those fields in which programs appear, on the surface at least, to “flesh out” policies.

The results are interesting. Of 220 possible cases, public sector activity is apparent in 120. Of these, only 31 (26%) show policy being “fleshed out” by programming while 20 cases (17%) show policy without programming and 69 cases (57%) show programming in the absence of policy.

The low incidence of complementary programming and policy activity suggests that, with respect to urban Aboriginal people, policies and programming activity appear to be largely unrelated. The most obvious case of this is Manitoba, where the lack of provincial policies for urban Aboriginal people has in no way impeded programming activity by that government. The obvious conclusion is that urban Aboriginal programs are not dependent on the existence of policies. An evaluation and comparison of programs founded upon policy with those that are not, although beyond the scope of this study, may shed additional light on this interesting finding.

CONCLUSION

This report has provided an overview of the enhanced programming landscape for urban Aboriginal people in six large urban centres in western Canada. The research found that federal, provincial, and municipal governments are each to some extent using a strategy of enhanced programming; however, this strategy is not universal either within or across jurisdictions. A supplemental strategy by federal and provincial governments involves providing funding for delivery of enhanced programming by Aboriginal and non-profit organizations. Although to a lesser extent, a similar statement may be made with respect to federal and provincial government funding of programs funded and/or delivered by municipal governments. The enhanced programming landscape is therefore somewhat unclear in that some governments have enhanced programming in some fields but not in others, and some fields have multiple levels of programming while others have none. In short, no consistency exists in enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people.

NOTE: The extent of the British Columbia government's program activity may be greater than Figure 7 indicates as a key resource on urban Aboriginal programs in Vancouver (Vancouver Aboriginal Council 2001) was not available in time to inform this project's research.

* HOUSING: No new funding or projects since 1996; honouring outstanding commitments only.

However, the research for this report has limitations. First, the fluid nature of urban Aboriginal programming is such that these findings could be outdated quickly, particularly in areas in which governments provide funding for Aboriginal or non-profit organizations to deliver programming. One example of the changing landscape is in the field of housing where, at the end of November 2001, federal and provincial governments announced their intention to pursue affordable housing initiatives (Canadian Intergovernmental Conference Secretariat 2001), which may see new enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people.

Second, some programs relevant to urban Aboriginal people – including programs of general application and programs not operational during the research phase – were not identified in this report. Other programs that may be relevant to urban Aboriginal people that do not appear in this study include those targeted towards particular neighbourhoods – some of which have high Aboriginal populations. For example, programs for the Vancouver Downtown Eastside, Saskatoon's Riversdale, or Winnipeg's Lord Selkirk neighbourhoods were not included in this review unless they fell within the definition of enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people.

As a result, while this report maps the landscape of enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people, it does not contain a complete inventory of the programs and services provided by governments and the non-profit sector. Even so, the research efforts necessary to uncover the program activity identified in this report hint of a larger challenge.

The research took well over six months with as many as three Canada West Foundation researchers working on the project at any one time. Members of the Advisory Committee for the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative complemented these efforts by providing a considerable amount of time and effort towards uncovering the programming landscape. In addition, the participating governments expended considerable human resources in getting a grasp on programming activity within their jurisdictions. The need for this very considerable effort arose because most governments are not in the practice of compiling inventories of their programming activities for a specific population sub-group – in this case, urban Aboriginal people. As a result, information requests necessitated the breaking of new ground, and departmental staff in turn became researchers attempting to uncover the activities of their own and other departments within their governments.

This points towards a real challenge with respect to urban Aboriginal people. Much of the programmatic activity of governments and non-profit organizations appears to be undertaken in the absence of a clear understanding of the programming already in place. To further exacerbate matters, those involved in the programming fields often do not have comprehensive information on available programs. This has resulted in urban Aboriginal programming that is largely disjointed and at times incoherent; the effort expended is impressive but the programmatic landscape becomes more, rather than less, daunting as a consequence. Thus, this report identifies a larger problem: If it is this difficult for researchers to identify and establish an inventory of programs for urban Aboriginal people, then what does this say about the challenges facing potential clients in attempting to access these programs?

ISSUES FOR FURTHER RESEARCH

The findings of this report suggest a need for further research on a number of fronts. Indeed, the mere identification of enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people can lead to more questions than answers.

1. The Role of Municipalities in Enhanced Programming for Urban Aboriginal People

Many commentators argue that municipal governments need to focus on core services and avoid becoming engaged in areas outside their mandated responsibilities (Vander Ploeg 2002, 3). Nevertheless, municipal governments are involved in enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people – albeit to a much lesser extent than the federal and provincial governments – despite the fiscal pressures they are experiencing (Vander Ploeg 2001). Commentators frequently assume that municipal governments become engaged due to a lack of senior government activity. However, and as this report demonstrates, a municipality is the sole government acting in only two instances (family – Saskatoon and Regina). This raises two questions: Why are municipal governments developing enhanced programs in fields beyond their core responsibilities? Should municipal governments develop programs in fields beyond their core responsibilities?

2. Program Duplication and Intergovernmental Cooperation

This study demonstrates the complexity of urban Aboriginal programming in western Canadian cities. A lack of agreement between federal and provincial governments over responsibility for urban Aboriginal people (Hanselmann 2001) is reflected in the programming landscape: the federal, provincial, and municipal governments are all active in some fields with at least two active in many. This situation introduces several questions: What is the level of coordination among governments in urban Aboriginal programming? Are governments duplicating programming efforts? Is there a need for greater intergovernmental coordination in programming? Is partnering among governments and Aboriginal or non-profit organizations a viable model for service delivery? Finally, a comprehensive examination of all federal, provincial, and municipal government programs available to urban Aboriginal people, including programs of general application – a task clearly beyond the scope of this study – remains to be performed.

3. Program Evaluation

Identifying programs is not the same as evaluating program effectiveness, efficiency, or impact; indeed, the mere existence of a program does not automatically mean that the program is adequately serving urban Aboriginal people. Therefore, proper program evaluation is required, particularly to determine whether strategies involving enhanced programming are optimal. This need provokes many questions: Are existing programs appropriate, sufficient, and effective? Is enhanced programming more, less, or as effective than is general application programming at attaining prescribed goals? Are enhanced programs complementary to or competing with programs of general application? Which programs constitute best practices? Which are worth emulating? Does the heterogeneity of urban Aboriginal populations affect service accessibility or availability?

4. Normative Elements

The first report of the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative raised a series of questions about the desirability of differentiated policy for urban Aboriginal people. These questions also apply to enhanced programming for urban Aboriginal people: Is there a right or entitlement to program differentiation? Is program differentiation good policy? At the root is an ideological question: Should programs treat all people equally or provide enhanced services to some?

With the states of urban Aboriginal policies and programming having been outlined, some of these questions can now be addressed in forthcoming reports of the Urban Aboriginal People Research Initiative. ■
